Motion capture suits provide the data allowing the movement of players to be recreated in-game. The technology was developed over a period of three years by a team of more than 20 specialists. The capturing technology is based on the work of scientists at the University of Rochester Medical Center. For the first time in FIFA, players are captured on three levels: (1) while controlling the ball with the left foot, (2) changing direction as the ball travels; and (3) as a result of their actions as the ball travels through the air. This data will be used to create and animate animations of players so that they react to the ball as they would in real-life. The first "HyperMotion" gameplay demo was revealed during an EA Live stream on March 13, and could be played at this year's E3 and Paris Games Week. The technology was included in this year's FIFA title as a result of a close collaboration with the University of Rochester Medical Center and its research team. Speaking at EA Live London on June 11, Fifa 22 Serial Key Producer Matt Prior described the technical breakthrough as "a special addition to FIFA." Prior went on to say that this year's FIFA is the most authentic in the series' history, with "player likeness, player animations, player behavior, movement - all created with player data." Q. What was the process of teaming up with the University of Rochester Medical Center? Matt Prior: The team from the University of Rochester Medical Center, who did the very important work of capturing the movements of players, started working with EA nearly three years ago. The team here at EA looked at that data and worked to recreate the players' movements and behavior. As they did that, the data was used to animate players in the game, so it was a great collaboration and a very valuable piece of the project. Q. What was the biggest challenge to the "HyperMotion" technology being included in FIFA? Matt Prior: We put a lot of time and effort into making sure that any technology in the game works and flows naturally with the overall gameplay. From our perspective, as the game was being crafted, the "HyperMotion" technology just made sense. From the first time that we heard of the technology and saw the player captures done at the University of Rochester Medical Center, it just made sense that we would include it
