Mutation of the prothrombin gene (PT) is a major risk factor for the occurrence of venous thromboembolism (VTE). However, only the mutation at positions 20210 and 20210 GG has been demonstrated to be a major risk factor for a first episode of VTE, especially deep-vein thrombosis (DVT). The present study investigated the occurrence and clinical significance of multiple PT mutations in patients with first episode of DVT, and its relationship with other genetic factors contributing to the development of VTE. We performed a case-control study of 178 unrelated patients with acute, unexplained DVT and 178 unrelated controls matched for age, sex, and geographic origin. The frequencies of the PT mutations at positions 20210 GG, 20210 AA, and 20210 CC were similar between patients and controls. The odds ratio for heterozygosity (0.71) and for homozygosity (0.35)
