Businesses often operate through the use of one or more applications and associated data. For example, a business (e.g., a software developer) may operate a production process for providing software to users. The software may be created through a number of steps, such as writing source code, compiling the source code into executable code, testing the executable code to ensure that it operates correctly, and deploying the executable code to one or more target systems. Thus, in the software production process, software developers may use a number of different applications to assist in the process. For example, a developer may use a word processor application to create source code, use a compiler to compile the source code into executable code, and use a debugger to debug the executable code. 'The Grand Budapest Hotel': Wes Anderson Looks Back on the 'Pulp Fiction' Influence Wes Anderson's 12th directorial effort, 'The Grand Budapest Hotel,' will be his first English-language picture in five years. Wes Anderson has had many influential relationships in his filmography, but the director has previously gone out of his way to distance himself from Quentin Tarantino's films. However, Anderson has had a "Pulp Fiction" influence in his latest directorial effort, the comic book-based The Grand Budapest Hotel. I've had a constant relationship with the Coen brothers since the time I was a teenager, which must go back to the '80s," Anderson says in the documentary How Wes Works. "[Joe] Carnahan is a huge influence on me. He's a brilliant filmmaker. I think he wrote the word 'pulp' into the dictionary." (Asked to elaborate on his comment,
